

ABSTRACT

Yesica Grace

The decision making of choosing religion for early adulthood people who have parents with different religion (Widya Risnawaty, M.Psi. & Dra. Ninawati, M.M.); Bachelor Degree, Faculty of Psychology, Tarumanagara University. Page 1-87, P1-P3

The purpose of this research is to describe decision making process in choosing religion for early adulthood person who has parents with different religion. Decision making is a process to evaluate and consider some alternatives, and then the individual has to choose one of the alternatives. Decision making surpasses some levels, like level of choosing, evaluate, and performance. Religion conversion is an action that people or groups of people do to join or migrate into another religion or believe which is contradicted to the previous believe. Collecting data from this research was done with interview method to five different subjects. These research subjects are consisting of individual aged 20-40 years old (early adulthood) and have parents with different religion. Based on this research results, we can conclude that the five subjects have surpassed decision making levels. Subjects see a various alternatives of religion from their parent's religion and the religion in the society. Then, subject will search for information that will be use as a reference to make decision that best fits them. At the last, after subjects finds the proper religion, that subjects will follow the religion's tenet.

Key words: decision making, religion conversion, different religion, early adulthood